REGIS UNIVERSITY MAGAZINE is published four times a year by the Office of Public Affairs at Regis University, 3333 Regis Boulevard, Denver, Colorado 80221. It is the official news magazine of Regis University.

Regis University is one of 28 Jesuit institutions of higher education in the United States. The University serves more than 1,100 students in its four-year program on the main Denver campus, while its undergraduate and graduate degree programs for adults serve more than 8,000 students in Boulder, Denver, Loveland, Colorado Springs and Sterling, Colorado; and Cheyenne and Gillette, Wyoming.

An Endowment of People

by Dr. Judson R. Shaver, Dean of Regis College

Higher costs, a shrinking population of 18 to 24 year-olds, increased outlays for financial aid, increasing economic pressure on the middle class, declining standards for college admission -- these are just some of the challenges which private higher education now faces. Among experts, the widely shared consensus is that these challenges will prove too great for a number of schools, and that most of the schools which do survive the next decade will do so with curtailed programs, smaller student bodies, and lower academic standards.

But not at Regis College. Indeed, the current crisis of private higher education constitutes, for us, an extraordinary opportunity. Regis College will not merely survive; we will approach the twenty-first century with a larger, more academically successful student body and with an increasing number of alumni whose lives of service have a profound impact on our world.

"And how exactly are you going to do that?" one might ask. First, let me tell you why. Why should we struggle to survive in an increasingly difficult and competitive arena? All across the country, colleges are facing the same issues that we face..., and are fighting for their existence. But Regis College is not like other colleges. That is why we must grow and flourish despite all obstacles.

Regis College, as you know, is distinctive; we are a College whose existence makes a difference. While we share much with the other Jesuit schools, we are uniquely committed to helping women and men deal with the fundamental issue of our times, namely: "How ought we to live?" This question, drawn from our Mission Statement, lies at the heart of a core curriculum designed to help assure that our graduates will be prepared in heart and mind to assume the crucial leadership roles of the next century. That is, of course, unless we shrink from the challenge and settle for less: fewer programs, lower quality; the road to ruin....

How, then, can Regis College flourish while others decline? By using our endowment to make a massive investment in our students. "What endowment?", you ask. "Is it wise to spend the capital?" Actually, while money would be a great help, I was referring to human capital. The people of the College, the staff and administration in supporting roles, but especially the faculty, are the College's endowment. The proven willingness of these people to invest in their students underlies my confidence in the future of the College. Here's how we'll do it. 1) due in part to a generation-long buyers' market, the College has assembled a surprisingly gifted and dedicated faculty; 2) competition for students, on the other hand, has been fierce, and has resulted in a student body which on the whole is less accomplished than the faculty; 3) many schools respond to the competition for students by increasing financial aid and lowering academic standards; the level of student academic achievement declines along with the school's reputation; their long term prognosis is not good; 4) the College faculty choose instead to increase their investment in motivating and supporting excellence in our students; 5) our students attain higher levels of excellence; 6) motivated and successful students are far less likely to drop out of college or to transfer to another school, so our retention of students improves; 7) with higher retention, we can be more selective, admitting only students whose ability and motivation suggests they will succeed at Regis; 8) the need to recruit fewer students also reduces our dependence on offers of financial aid as a means of attracting students; we will thus be able to reduce the amount of financial aid and/or target financially needy students whose presence will enrich the College.

The potential return on this investment genuinely excites me. Like all investment programs, however, this will take discipline and the active participation of many (parents, alumni, faculty, friends, staff--the whole College community). Our success, and we will succeed, will be measured not just by our increased size or financial strength but by the impact our students and alumni have on a world which truly needs them.

Academic Challenge
That's probably what Karen Chapman envisioned in 1971 when the Regis professor ventured into uncharted territory and planted the seeds that have grown into what is known today as the Honors Program in Regis College of Regis University.

T H E HONORS Program

Her fledgling cross-cultural studies program featured a series of seminars centered around specific themes. It was the foundation for an evolutionary cycle that led to a Scholars Program, a Humanities Colloquium and eventually, the Honors Program.

"The program has always emphasized interdisciplinary studies," according to Eugene L. Stewart, current director of the program. "There are several substantive changes in the program from those early days, but the program has really benefitted from the evolutionary path it has taken."

Following Karen Chapman's move to California, Drs. Deborah Gaensbauer and Roger Martin kept the momentum going and developed the Scholars Program. Students were recruited into the program during their sophomore year and continued through their senior year. The special courses were focused on literature and art and covered specific historical eras: Ancient and Medieval, Renaissance, Baroque and Neo-Classical.

There was still a gap for freshman students, though, and in 1980, Dr. Margaret McDonald, with $100,000 of support through an AIDP grant, introduced the Humanities Colloquium for freshmen only. It was modeled after a highly successful program at Georgetown University and concentrated on literature and history. It was team taught by Dr. McDonald and Dr. Ronald Brockway.

Dr. Joanne Karpinski and Fr. Adam Bunnell continued the program's evolutionary momentum, taking over the Humanities Colloquium in 1986 upon the retirement of Dr. McDonald.

"I think one of the real substantive things that has happened over the years is that we have developed a program that is not just something that shows up on a student's transcript as 'Honors.' We now have a program that encourages students to publish both in small ways and big ways," Stewart noted.

The most recent evolution of the program is its four year focus. Freshman students, those who have demonstrated high achievement in high school, now apply for the program and potential honors scholarship dollars. These students generally have a high school grade point average of 3.5 or better, usually in the 3.7 to 3.9 category and their minimum entrance test scores are in the 26

ACT or 1040 SAT range. The program is kept small intentionally to ensure the personal one on one involvement with faculty. Sixteen students from each class or a total of 64 are invited to participate.

“What we have are students who take great pride in their academic achievements and because of that we are pleased to profile them,” Stewart explained. “In some ways it is similar to the pride an athlete takes in his or her athletic challenges and accomplishments. In the Honors Program, the students love the intellectual challenge, and they can accomplish that in a variety of ways at Regis. But I think they also want the achievement challenge and the Honors Program provides them with that opportunity.”

Nick Jackson '92, was invited to join the program as a freshman and was in the program until his graduation in May. “I really feel as though the Honors Program made my college experience more meaningful,” he explained. “I grew up in a family that emphasized the importance of education. When I was invited to participate in the Honors Program, I considered it an honor and a privilege.”

Jackson's pursuits at Regis, however, were not just tied to the classroom. The political science and psychology major worked his way through the editorial staff of the student newspaper, serving as sportswriter during his freshman year and eventually being named as editor-in-chief for his senior year.

He also served for three years in the Circle K (Kiwanis sponsored) club on campus. During his sophomore year, Jackson was Lieutenant Governor of the Circle K district and as a junior was elected Governor. He made a run for international trustee of Circle K as a senior, but his bid fell short.

The publishing focus of the program also had appeal for Jackson, particularly the senior synthesis course. “We are required to do a senior thesis project,” he said. “I decided to do some research on the Camp David Accords and compare them with the current Arab-Israeli peace process. I enjoyed it because I looked at it from the perspective of the significant global and regional changes that have taken place between the Accords and now.”

The philosophy behind the publishing flows “from an attitude that we should share our academic products,” Stewart explained. “It is an openness to undergraduate publishing that hasn't been in academia for a long time.”

“I really feel as though the Honors Program made my college experience more meaningful. I grew up in a family that emphasized the importance of education. When I was invited to participate in the Honors Program, I considered it an honor and a privilege.”

- Nick Jackson '92

Julie Clayton '92, who, like Jackson, has been accepted to the Peace Corps, took a more personal approach to the thesis project. For her the senior thesis was an opportunity to create “a scrapbook of my experiences of ministry.”

The Psychology and Religious Studies major continued, “My hope is that these pages show how I've formed my own idea of ministry from thinking of ministry solely as helping someone else who is less fortunate, to an idea of ministry as a dance between the minister and the one ministered to.”

“For me, my Regis education was complete because of the experiential activities I was involved with,” Clayton pointed out. “The senior thesis project helped me synthesize those experiences where I was deeply touched by the individuals I met.”

Clayton's writings reflect on her work in four venues: a home for battered women and prostitutes; a home for victims of AIDS; the Samaritan Shelter for the homeless; and her spring break trip to Belize, South America to work as a volunteer.

“I saw my participation in the Honors Program as an academic challenge,” she added. “I think it is helpful to have an organization like that because we historically celebrate athletic excellence. The Honors Program highlights academic excellence.”

Academic challenge and excellence is a common theme among participants in the program, but so is flexibility.

Stacy Valencia '92, will be attending the University of Colorado Law School this fall. “I was in the talented and gifted program in high school,” she said. “And I think the flexibility and challenge of the Honors Program really kept me in school. It provided the opportunity to experiment with different fields of study.”

“I started as a pre-med major and was originally asked by Joanne Karpinski to enter the Humanities Colloquium. It was nice because I could take 400 level courses in my second semester as a freshman.”

Valencia eventually changed her major to History and Political Science and was on the Dean's List in seven of her eight semesters at Regis.

Ignatian Society Inducts 71 Charter Members

A total of 71 alumni, parents and friends have accepted the invitation to Charter Membership in the new Regis University Ignatian Society. The Society was established during the Ignatian Year to recognize those who have included Regis in their estate plans. The Charter Members have made a variety of planned gifts, including bequests, gifts of life insurance, charitable gift annuities and charitable remainder trusts.

The Charter Members will be recognized later this fall at the First Annual Regis Ignatian Society Luncheon, scheduled for Wednesday, October 21, 1992. In addition, members receive a distinctive certificate, invitations to special Regis events and other benefits. Perhaps the most important benefit is the satisfaction of providing for the future of Regis University by contributing to the school's endowment.

Staley Joins Regis' Board of Trustees

Regis University's Board of Trustees announced that Dr. Thomas F. Staley would become the newest trustee during their Summer meeting.

Dr. Staley is Director of the Harry Ransom Humanities Research Center at the University of Texas at Austin, where he is also Chancellor's Council Centennial Professor in the Book Arts and Professor of English. He received his BS. and B.A. from Regis College in 1957, and his M.A., in Literature from the University of Pittsburgh in 1961. In 1979, He received an honorary Doctorate in Humane Letters from Regis.

Dr. Staley has written and edited thirteen books on James Joyce and modern literature including British women novelist, Jean Rhys and Dorothy Richardson. His critical articles have appeared in journals in this country and abroad. He has been the chairman and co-chairman for four international James Joyce symposia in Dublin and Trieste, and is a board member and former president of the James Joyce Foundation. He was a Fulbright Scholar at the University of Trieste in 1966 and again in 1971.

One Thousand Students Attend Summer School '92

The campus was bustling this past summer as close to a thousand students of all ages participated in a variety of programs offered through the Summer School at Regis University.

Lots of familiar faces were seen around campus as more than 200 traditional undergraduates enrolled in courses taught by members of the Regis full-time faculty. Students pondered ethical problems in business, boosted their small business management skills, sharpened their speaking savvy, explored the relationship between myth and literature, discovered Europe, and much more. Summer students found that they could concentrate on the courses needed to fulfill core or graduation requirements in a more relaxed atmosphere. Other students took summer courses to accelerate their degree completion, lighten their academic load for subsequent semesters or investigate new areas.

Regis' special pre-collegiate enrichment programs for elementary, middle school, and secondary school students brought over 200 kids to campus. They explored the marvels of the world of science in our popular Regis Institute of Chemical Education (RICE) camps, auditioned, rehearsed, and performed in our Mid-Summer Musical Theater program, and advanced their academic skills in the College For Kids program.

A broad selection of courses in education for teachers seeking recertification and/or graduate credit again were offered throughout the summer. More than 500 teachers from school districts throughout Colorado, Wyoming, Nebraska, Utah, Kansas, Arizona, Minnesota, New York, California, and Mexico attended Regis' special educator institutes and courses this summer.

The theme for the popular Whole Language Literacy Institute was "Celebrating Authors: The Creating Adventure" and featured prominent whole language experts such as: Heather Forest, Andrea Butler, Shelley Harwayne, Mary Ellen Giacobbe, and Priscilla Lynch. Now in its sixth year, over 3,000 educators have taken the institute for academic credit, representing school districts from 27 states and three foreign countries.

The second annual Regis Early Childhood Institute focused on math, science, and thinking skills in the early childhood years. Keynote speakers, Larry Lowery, Associate Dean and Professor of Education in the Graduate School of Education at the University of California/Berkeley, and Jane Healy, internationally recognized authority on learning and brain development, set the stage for three days of interactive workshops where participants explored ways to foster important concepts in the classroom.

To cap off the summer, Regis University and The Colorado Department of Education co-sponsored an institute for educators on learning styles entitled, "No Excuses!

All Students Can Learn." Regis was honored to have Dr. Howard Gardner of Harvard University as the institute's featured speaker. Gardner's internationally acclaimed work on multiple intelligences served as the focus for this important program which attracted teachers and administrators from throughout the state. Workshop sessions, based on Gardner's work, demonstrated ways in which teachers could support and nurture diverse learning styles.

Gardner's research focuses on the development of human cognitive capacities, particularly those central in the arts. He is engaged in efforts at educational reform in the areas of assessment, attention to individual differences in learning, and the professional development of teachers. He is the author of over 300 articles and eleven books which include, Frames of Mind, The Mind's New Science, Art Education and Human Development and his latest book The Unschooled Mind: How Children Think, How Schools Should Teach.

Donald Bigelow (left) and his daughter, Angelle Bigelow, both graduated with honors from the MBA Program this May. The competition between the two provided an incentive for each of them to work harder, but what was most important was the time they spent together in joint classes and the support they gave each other along the way.

"(Dr.) Alice Reich was my advisor and she allowed me to be self-directed. I was very thankful for that. I was able to make some choices and when I was a junior I decided to enter law school. That was exactly what I needed."

Science majors are a more recent addition to the Honors Program. Chris Cooley '92, who characterizes himself as "probably the oldest person in the program," received his degree this past May in Biology and Chemistry."

His road to the program was an unusual one. He graduated from a high school in Vermont -- nineteen years ago. "I had been working as an auto technician for Mercedes Benz, but I've always had a special interest in science."

"I had never been to college, but in the summer of 1988, I saw that Regis was offering an Environmental Chemistry course and I took it as an exploratory kind of thing. I liked it so much that I knew this was where I wanted to come. I put in an admissions application, was accepted and entered that fall."

Cooley was asked to join the Honors Program by Fr. Bunnell, and "I decided it would be more of a challenge for me," said Cooley. It also offered some flexibility in the core and the opportunity to work on a project of your choice."

His choice of project turned out to be his senior thesis. He began working with Dr. Harry Taylor, who was doing research on the origin of three species of parthenogenetic (all-female) lizards. The research project led Cooley and Dr. Taylor to an August conference at the University of Texas at El Paso to make a presentation on their findings.

Cooley is waiting on word from the University of Oklahoma graduate school and is hoping to teach after completing his graduate work.

The evolution of the program continues, according to Stewart. "We have organized an honors club that calls itself Polaris, after the north star. The self-image of the group is that they are both academic and intellectual leaders. They love ideas. They love the academic challenge."

Regis University Expands to the Mountains

In a cooperative agreement with the Colorado Mountain College system, two programs from Regis University's School for Professional Studies are expanding the mission of Regis University by providing educational opportunities for students in the Colorado Mountain College system and environs. RECEP and University Without Walls programs are working together to serve these students and mountain residents.

Colorado Mountain College, which serves 20,000 students across 15 campuses in its six county area, is a well-established community resource in the mountain communities and has for many years desired a close working relationship with a four year degree institution.

Regis University is proud to be the university selected in this cooperative agreement. Bob Evans, CMCs Vice President for Educational Services, has stated, "This is one of the most exciting things that has happened to the CMC college district in years. We have been hearing from people for some time that they'd like consistent baccalaureate and masters level courses in our service area."

Through this arrangement, University Without Walls will expand its current statewide guided independent study program at both undergraduate and graduate levels. RECEP will begin undergraduate courses at Glenwood Springs in August 1992, Steamboat Springs in January 1993 and Breckenridge in September 1993. RECEP degrees will be: Bachelor of Science in Business Administration with emphases in management, marketing and international business, and a psychology minor. UWW degrees will be: Bachelor of Arts in Liberal Arts, Teacher Certification and Master of Arts in Liberal Studies.

Remodeling of Student Center Nears Completion

Construction work on the Student Center is well underway and should be completed in a few weeks! The work includes the provision of an additional, handicap accessible restroom off the lobby, a new entrance and stairwell design, and new entrances to the bookstore, cafeteria, and snackbar. Although it will not be immediately available, space has also been designed for a general use ATM machine.

The bookstore will double in size and permit our new contractors, Follett College Stores, to completely upgrade the store interior and offer the promised expanded services.

According to Jim Schoemer, vice president for administration, the size of the snack bar will significantly increase. He said a nice new feature, popular on many campuses, is an outdoor patio eating area. This area will be fenced in and provided with umbrellas.

An Open Letter to Fr. Clarke

Dear Father Clarke,

As I look back on the past seventeen years since I began teaching at Regis College, I can appreciate the significant changes that have come about during your tenure as president. It seems that so many of the dreams that we faculty had in the seventies have now come to fruition. When I return to the Regis campus today, as I did recently for the Mass and brunch you sponsored, I am so proud of the changed appearance of the campus, the professional spirit of the faculty (most of them new since I started in 1975) and — best of all — the mature and responsible attitude of the students I've seen there.

Regis today is a far cry from the campus I knew in the seventies. In those years, several faculty members and a handful of visionary students labored mightily to build recognition for the then-embryonic Cultural Affairs Committee which we hoped would enhance the student body's appreciation of music, theater, and the fine arts. But cajoling Regis students to attend a concert or even look at an exhibit of art was a discouraging task. More than once we had more performers on stage than we had viewers in the audience. It took at least a decade of uphill work to change the ambience of Regis College, but now, from the distanced perspective of a retired professor, I can see that Regis is finally beginning to accept the values of a liberal arts college.

It was so rewarding for me to observe a concert grand piano in the new chapel, available for recitals as well as choral accompaniment. And the choir that sang for Mass made me want to stand up and shout, "At last! Music at Regis!"

Later when I entered the student dining room for lunch, I was struck by the attractive decor which has transformed this once-ugly room. It seems to reflect a gracious living pattern which is becoming more and more evident with each passing year. You provided soil for seeds to germinate; now they are in bloom.

But these are only cosmetic transformations, I suppose. Far more important are the subtle changes in both the faculty and the student body. We can all be proud of our faculty who have gained national recognition for their publications as well as their dedication to teaching. And the administrators such as Tom Reynolds and Ken Phillips whom you brought to Regis have done much to refine the tenor of student life.

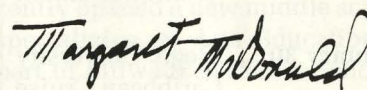

The most impressive growth I've noticed, however, is in the maturation of our students. A decade ago, few Regis students were interested in working for the betterment of society-alleviating the plight of the homeless, for example. Today I read about Regis students who spent their spring break helping to build a home for impoverished families in Mexico and students working at the Samaritan shelter and in AIDS Hospices.

The significance of this sea of change in student goals cannot be underestimated. The Regis undergraduates are finally becoming (to use one of your favorite epithets) "men and women in the service of others."

Thank you for your two decades of service to Regis and particularly for ensuring the climate in which these seeds of change could germinate.

Sincerely,

Margaret McDonald
